FOREWORD

THE DOOR IS YOU

If you have read the other books and something in them would not let you go, this one is for you. The philosophy told you why the world is failing. Hunateculture showed you how a life is built differently. Becoming Hunatian walked you through the inner change. The Hunate Movement laid out the plan and the rules. This book answers the last question, the personal one: how do I actually join?

Let me say at the start what joining is not. It is not a job, and we are not hiring. There is no salary waiting, no title to collect, no ladder to climb. What there is instead is a place in a work that matters, and a way of becoming the kind of human that work needs. You do not come to serve a boss. You come to build, beside others, something the world badly needs and mostly refuses to attempt.

There is no single door, because the movement needs more than one kind of person. It needs engineers to design the life of a hub, mentors to guard the wisdom, district representatives to carry it into their own communities, families and orphanages brave enough to become living examples, supporters to fuel the work honestly, and the wider circle of artisans, builders, and young learners who make it all real. This book has a place for each of them.

Read it honestly, and measure yourself against it honestly. We are not looking for a crowd. We are looking for the few who are ready. If that is you, welcome. Let us build.

PART ONE

The Spirit of Joining

What joining really means, and the ways in.

THE SPIRIT OF JOINING

You Do Not Work for Hunate, You Are Hunate

Before any role or any form, understand the spirit of the thing, because it is unlike almost any group you have been asked to join. You do not work for Hunate. You are Hunate. The moment you truly join, you are not a hired hand carrying out someone else's plan; you are a creator, a learner, and an ethical leader in your own right, in service to a regenerative future. This is a journey of becoming before it is ever a job of doing.

That way of being rests on a few simple commitments. The first is embodiment and ownership. We do not preach what we do not live. You carry the work as your own, not as a task you were assigned, and you take responsibility for building the alternative rather than blaming the system for what is broken.

The second is that everyone is at once a seeker, a learner, and a teacher. No one arrives finished. You come to keep learning for the rest of your life, from books, from mentors, from the farmer and the child and the soil, and at the same time to teach and lift the ones a step behind you. The learning never ends, and neither does the giving.

The third is trust. We build on trust rather than on contracts and suspicion, because a team bound by genuine trust is anti-fragile, it grows stronger under pressure instead of shattering. And the fourth is the visionary seed: each member is expected not just to fill a role but to nurture the future, guiding younger learners and leaving behind more capable humans than they found.

*You are not working for Hunate. You are Hunate.
Our mission is not only to design systems, but to redesign ourselves, into the kind of humans capable of stewarding a new civilization rooted in balance, ethics, and beauty.*

The Ways In

There is no single way to join, because the work needs more than one kind of person. Before you go deeper, find yourself on this map. Each of these is a real door, and the rest of the book walks through them one by one.

The Hunate Engineers are the core team, the life designers. If you carry a real skill in one of the Hunateculture fields and you want to give your working life to designing hubs alongside others, this is the deep path, and most of this book is about it.

The Hunate Mentors are the guardians of wisdom. If you are further along the road, an experienced elder or professional, and you would rather guide and steady the young than run the daily work, you come as a mentor.

The District Representatives are the roots in the ground. If your gift is your own community, knowing it, being trusted in it, carrying the message into it, you become the movement's eyes, ears, and heart in your district.

The Hubs are the families and orphanages who are brave enough to become living examples, letting their home and land be redesigned as a lighthouse for others. The Supporters are the donors and sponsors who fuel the work honestly and openly. And the wider circle, the artisans, builders, and young students, are the many hands and the next generation without whom none of it stands.

Find your door. Then read on, and measure yourself honestly against what it asks.

PART TWO

The Core Team

Becoming a Hunate Engineer: the shared path, the roles, and the way in.

THE ENGINEERS

Becoming a Hunate Engineer

The Hunate Engineers are the living foundation of the movement, the life designers who guide a family or an orphanage through its whole transformation. An engineer is not merely a specialist for hire. Each one leads a single domain of the work while learning all the others, so that together the team can redesign a whole life, a whole home, a whole piece of land. This is the deep path, the one that asks the most and gives the most, and everything in this part is about walking it.

Before we come to the separate roles, there is a set of responsibilities that every engineer carries, whatever their field. These are the shared ground, the habits and commitments that make someone a Hunatian and not just a talented person on a team.

You build an honest public presence in your field and connect it to the movement's, representing the work with professionalism, humility, and integrity. You write your own story, what you see as broken in the world and how you mean to help heal it, and you keep reflecting on how you are changing as you go. You keep a living record of your skills and learning, and you study seriously: read the handbook closely, mark the ideas that move you and the questions that trouble you, and keep a learning journal you actually use.

You hold a daily discipline, because we cannot design a healthy world from unhealthy bodies and scattered minds. A short daily practice of yoga or training, a few quiet minutes of meditation or journaling, and real care for your food, your sleep, and your use of screens. You give the work time every day, even an hour, choosing consistency over intensity, because a movement is built by steady hands, not by bursts. And you seek out mentors to learn from, while you turn and guide the younger learners coming up behind you, planting leadership in others rather than hoarding it.

Finally, you think in legacy. You imagine your work with Hunate a year out, five years out, and beyond, and you begin building something that will outlast you, a handbook, a course, a guide in your own field. Because in the end the point is not the task. You are not working for Hunate. You are Hunate, and the deepest work is redesigning yourself into a human capable of stewarding a new civilization.

THE ROLES

The Thirteen Roles

Each engineer leads one domain of the work while learning all the others. We hold the roles in the same three rings that hold the whole philosophy: Human, Nature, and Technology. You join at one role, in one ring, and grow outward from there until you understand the whole. Below is each role and what it tends. Astrology sits as a bridge between the human and the technological, and so it closes the last ring.

The Human Ring

These roles tend the human being: the vision that guides, the body and mind that must be trained, the story that must be told and shown, and the ethics that must be kept.

Visionary and Project Founder (Guide)

The guardian of the vision, the philosophy, and the ethical direction. This role holds the long-term strategy and the cultural coherence of the whole movement, trains the teams in the Hunate principles and the art of life design, and represents the work in the world. For now, it is mine to carry.

Yoga and Meditation Guide

The keeper of physical, emotional, and spiritual wellness. This engineer designs daily practices of body and breath for individuals and for children, and runs the retreats, workshops, and sessions that keep the whole team, and the hubs, strong and steady from the inside out.

Content and Media Creator

The one who captures the journey and tells it truthfully. This engineer produces the interviews, the short films, and the stories that carry the ethics and the beauty of the work to the world, turning real life into a living record rather than an advertisement.

Graphic Designer and Visual Communicator

The one who translates the philosophy into a visual language. This engineer shapes the branding, the posters, and the templates, and gives the storytelling across every platform a look that is unmistakably ours, raw, natural, and true to the movement's heart.

Law, Policy and Ethics Guide

The anchor of governance in justice and transparency. This engineer advises on legal ground and on the ethical charters, and drafts the open-knowledge and use guidelines that keep the work honest and free.

The Nature Ring

These roles tend the living world and the way a human dwells within it: the food, the land, the building, and the placement of things.

Permaculture Farm Designer

The maker of regenerative food and land systems. This engineer designs the farm as a living ecosystem of soil, water, plants, and animals, and helps families and orphanages reach real food security through circular, self-renewing design.

Eco-Architecture Lead

The designer of ecological, spiritually grounded buildings. This engineer develops the home and community prototypes in natural materials, drawing on local building traditions and Vastu, and keeping every structure in the image of nature.

Vastu Consultant

The keeper of spatial harmony and the flow of energy. This engineer guides the choosing of land and the placement of things, and gives each home and farm a layout that agrees with the earth and the sky rather than fighting them.

Ayurveda and Food Systems Guide

The designer of food, health, and nutrition for a community. This engineer aligns the local crops and the daily diet with the body's real needs and the turning of the seasons, and trains families in holistic health and conscious cooking.

The Technology Ring

These roles tend the tools and the means: the digital ecosystem, the honest handling of money, the machines that free human hands, and the timing that ties it all to the wider cosmos.

Web and IT Lead

The builder of the movement's digital ecosystem. This engineer launches and keeps the website, the forms, and the data systems, and gives the team the digital tools it needs to work together and to stay transparent.

Finance, Sponsorship and Fundraising Coordinator

The guardian of resources and of trust. This engineer manages the donations, the budgets, and the reports, builds the honest sponsorship and partnership proposals, and above all keeps the movement's vow of radical transparency real in the numbers.

Mechanical and Renewable Systems Engineer

The one who frees human hands and powers the work cleanly. This engineer brings the simple, repairable machines and the local, renewable energy, sun, water, biogas, into the hubs, always choosing tools that a community can run and mend for itself.

Astrology and Timing Advisor

The bridge between the human and the technological, reading the wider cycles we live inside. This engineer helps map temperament and rhythm and choose sound timing for the work, treating astrology as a tool for planning and self-understanding, never as fortune telling.

CHOOSING AND GROWING

How We Choose, and How You Grow

We choose our people carefully, because a movement is only as sound as the humans inside it. But the choosing is not what you might expect. The Hunate interview is not a test, and it is not a performance to pass. It is a dialogue of alignment, a conversation to see whether your intention and ours are truly the same, and whether we can build together honestly.

So the conversation moves through a few honest layers. We want to understand the person first, your story, your worldview, your values, what actually moves you. Then your skills and your vision, what you can really do, how you create, how committed you are. Then the fit of character, your openness, your ethics, whether you can work with others and hold your own discipline. And finally your readiness to collaborate, your willingness to teach, to learn, and to build a community rather than a career. The questions reach for personal truths, not rehearsed answers, because we are choosing a companion for a long road, not filling a seat.

Once you are in, the growing never stops, and it runs on two tracks at once. The first is a universal path every member walks: read the handbook and reflect on it, keep a learning journal, hold the daily discipline of body and mind and ethical living, connect with mentors while guiding the juniors behind you, and contribute your own work to the movement and its community. The second is a path specific to your role, where you go deep in your own field through a curated reading list, real practical assignments, and mentorship, drawing on both the classical texts and the best modern work in your domain.

And who is this path for? We look for people who are young, roughly under thirty, still forming and still hungry, and who are physically, mentally, and spiritually balanced. People already active in study, work, or their community, who carry a real skill in one or more of the Hunate domains. Above all, we look for self-driven researchers and creators, not followers. We are not building an audience. We are gathering builders.

THE WAY IN

The Onboarding Journey

If the path is for you, here is the actual road in, step by step. It is designed less to filter you out than to let both sides discover, slowly and honestly, whether this is right.

It begins with the invitation and outreach, through our videos, our open calls, and the word of people who already walk with us. If you answer, there is an initial interview, the first dialogue, to feel out your vision and your readiness. Then come the reflection assignments, where you write your own story and your community's, so we meet the real person behind the skills.

Next are the learning tasks, where you study the Hunate frameworks and ethics and show that you have truly engaged with them, not just skimmed. Then the creative challenge: you draft a short course, a nine-minute teaching video carrying thirty clear points from your own field, because the fastest way to know whether someone understands something is to watch them teach it.

After that comes the final interview and agreement, where a long-term commitment is confirmed on both sides, honestly and with open eyes. Then the digital identity setup, building your public presence and linking it to the movement. And finally integration: you join the online team, take up your role, and prepare for the day the team gathers in person to live and build together. The Core Team is not defined by what we do, but by who we are becoming, and this journey is where that becoming begins.

PART THREE

The Other Ways In

Mentors, district representatives, hubs, supporters, and the wider circle.

GUIDES AND ROOTS

Mentors and District Representatives

The engineers are the core, but they cannot stand alone. Above them in experience stand the mentors, and out in the country stand the district representatives. Both are ways of joining that ask for something different from the engineer's path.

The Hunate Mentors

A mentor is a guardian of wisdom. If you are further along the road than most, an experienced elder or a seasoned professional in one of the Hunateculture domains, you may be called not to run the daily work but to watch over it. Mentors give the young engineers and the whole movement their guidance, their oversight, and their ethical grounding.

We seek mentors carefully, and we seek them for the right thing. We come to you for your wisdom and your character, never for your authority, your title, or your fame. What we ask in return is not command but care: to guide a new generation, to hold them to a high and honest standard, and to commit yourself to an ethical future rather than to your own name. The relationship is built on trust and mutual respect, and it is offered, never demanded.

The District Representatives

If your gift is your own place, its people, its language, its trust, then you may be the movement's roots there. A district representative is our eyes, our ears, and our heart within a district of Nepal, the living bridge between the wider vision and the real life of a local community.

We look for people who are physically healthy, mentally strong, confident, and sharp, who understand the project deeply enough to see both the wounds and the possibilities around them. But how you carry the work matters as much as your ability. You build on trust, never on pressure or empty promises. You facilitate and empower a community rather than trying to direct it. You honour local culture and wisdom while carrying the universal vision, and you patiently weave a web of local allies so that Hunateculture, when it comes, finds ground already prepared. The work itself is honest local research, real relationships with local leaders, the careful and ethical gathering of possible partner families and orphanages, and spreading the message with integrity, in the places where people already gather.

THE LIVING EXAMPLES

Hubs: Families and Orphanages

Some do not join to design other people's lives, but to let their own become the proof. These are the Hubs, the families and the orphanages brave enough to be redesigned into living examples of Hunateculture. If that is you, understand first that you would not be our beneficiary. You would be our co-creator, and the lighthouse of your own community.

We choose partner hubs with great care, because this is a deep and long relationship. We look for families and orphanages with genuine openness, a real willingness to learn and to change, and a place, land, and people, where a true example can take root and be seen. And we choose slowly, together, through what we call informed consent: not a form signed in a hurry, but a long mutual discovery, through videos, through several honest conversations, through visits to your home and land, and a final, clear-eyed review of every expectation and every hard part before anything is agreed. We want partners who understand the whole meal before they sit down, not ones who leave after the first taste.

What a hub receives is the Hunateculture Life Design Package, made for you and no one else. A Personal Blueprint for each person, drawn from astrology and Ayurveda, for health, routine, and work. A Land Blueprint for your home and ground, drawn from Vastu, eco-architecture, and permaculture. And a Vision Blueprint, an honest, ethical way for your family or home to earn its living from its own skills and land. As part of that last piece, you choose the trades you want to build your future on, from farming and food to crafts, technology, wellness, hospitality, education, and care, and we co-design the path with you and train you to run it yourselves.

And we are honest about what we ask in return, because a real partnership runs both ways. Joining as a hub is a serious, long commitment, a minimum of five years, because a life is not redesigned in a season and we do not want partners who give up before the work can bear fruit. Should a hub choose to leave before that time, we part with respect, but also with responsibility: through an open and fair process, the community reckons the value of the time, energy, and resources the movement gifted, so that a serious commitment stays serious. This is not to trap anyone. It is to honour, on both sides, the depth of what we are building together.

THE WIDER CIRCLE

Supporters, Artisans, and Students

Not everyone who belongs to this work will design a hub or lead a domain. A movement stands on a much wider circle: the ones who fuel it, the ones who build it with their hands, and the ones who are still learning and will carry it on. There is a real place here for each of them.

The Supporters

The supporters are the donors and sponsors who make the work possible. If this is your way in, know that we hold your trust as sacred, and we return it with total openness. You are shown, more deeply than the general public, exactly where your contribution goes and what it changes, because our vow of radical transparency is strongest with the people who fund us. There is an honest catalog of what a gift can directly build, and our financial records are open for you to walk through. And there is one thing we promise in both directions: supporting the movement never buys influence over it. You fuel the work because you believe in it, not to bend it, and we would rather refuse a gift than let it quietly steer us.

The Artisans and Builders

A hub is not built by designers alone. It is raised by real hands: carpenters and woodworkers, ironsmiths and metalworkers, stone builders and potters, electricians, plumbers, and the producers of honest local materials. If you carry one of these crafts, there is a place for you beside the engineers, turning the design on paper into a home, a farm, a workshop that actually stands. This work is as honoured here as any other, because a philosophy that cannot be built is only a daydream.

The Students

And then there are the young, the students and learners who are not ready to lead a domain yet but are hungry to grow into one. You are not an afterthought; you are the whole point of the long game. Every engineer is asked to guide a few younger learners, so there is always a hand reaching back for yours. Come as a volunteer, learn on the ground, take up the practices, and grow, and in time you may walk any of the deeper paths in this book. The movement is not only building homes and farms. It is raising the humans who will carry all of this forward long after the rest of us are gone.

PART FOUR

What Every Member Commits To

The vows we live by, and how we handle conflict.

THE COMMITMENT

What Every Member Vows

Whatever door you came through, engineer, mentor, hub, or supporter, you agree to live by a shared charter. It is not a set of rules to be enforced, but a set of vows to be embodied. It is the compass for our decisions and the mirror of our integrity, and beneath all of it lies a single guiding ethic: build a future based on natural law, if you do not want trouble. That is the test for every choice we make. If it aligns with the regenerative, life-affirming laws of nature, it is the Hunate way. If it does not, we do not take it.

The first vow is independence and self-reliance. We remain unregistered by the conventional systems, on purpose, so that we never join the machine we are trying to heal, never bend to bureaucratic control, and never wait for permission from political or corporate powers to fix our own lives. Our independence is itself a teaching: citizens can solve their own problems.

The second is radical transparency. Our trust is not built on a certificate but on the undeniable proof of our actions. We publish clear, regular reports of our finances and our progress for anyone to see, we give our partners and supporters a deeper look at where their contribution actually goes, and we answer honest questions openly, because we have nothing to hide.

The third is open knowledge. The wisdom we gather is not ours to own; it is a gift to be shared. Our handbooks, courses, and designs are open source. We will not spend our energy guarding what we know, and if another takes our work and uses it, we will not fight them; we trust that a seed of regeneration, once planted, grows, and that our open journey is proof enough of who planted it.

The fourth is a vow people rarely expect from a movement: mutual care and regenerative work. We are not building this on the ashes of burnout; we are building a family. We commit to healthy food, exercise, rest, and a sustainable pace, and when a member of the team faces a real crisis, the community carries them, with time, with resources, or simply with a listening ear.

The fifth is conscious iteration. We reject the illusion of perfection and embrace learning by doing. A mistake made once is a lesson; a mistake made twice is a choice. We learn from failure quickly, write down the lesson, and adapt without shame or blame, because this whole project is a living work that will never stop evolving. And the sixth is continuity: so the movement does not rest on one person's memory or one person's hands, the funds are held by the finance engineer rather than the founder, and a trusted second is always ready, so the work can endure.

Then there are the vows we make outward, to the people we serve. We vow to do no harm: never to knowingly degrade a human's potential, nor nature's integrity, nor the wellbeing of the generations to come. We vow to informed consent: no family or orphanage ever partners with us in the dark, but only after a long, honest process of mutual discovery, with full understanding of both the gifts and the hard parts. And we vow a graceful exit: a partnership is a serious, multi-year commitment, and if it must end early, we part through a fair and open process that honours what was given on both sides.

Beneath the vows runs a culture we try to live daily. We do not preach what we do not practice; our lives are our message. If we fight each other, we fall; if we serve each other, we rise. We treat the farmer, the child, and the soil as our teachers, and we listen more than we speak. We are here to serve the mission, not to build personal empires or titles. And we do not blame the system; we take responsibility for building the alternative.

Finally, two things worth naming. When the heaviest decisions come, they are weighed by a council in which no single voice can dominate: the public, the hubs, the engineers, and the founder each carry a real share, with the mentors and the supporters carrying theirs, so that wisdom is collective. The full workings of that governance live in the book before this one. And our true measure of success is not material output but what we call the Soul KPI: a hub has succeeded when its people are healthy, capable, wise, and self-reliant, when its land is abundant and nature is healing, and when it has a thriving community around it. That, above every number, is what we are actually building.

WHEN WE DISAGREE

How We Handle Conflict

We do not fear conflict; we honour it. A healthy ecosystem is not silent, it is alive with the tension of growth, and a thriving community is not one without disagreement but one that has learned to move through it with wisdom. So this is not a set of rules to punish wrongdoing. It is a pathway for turning friction into insight, and every conflict is treated as a teacher, a chance to see our own shadows, refine how we speak, and strengthen the bonds between us.

Three principles guide the whole approach. Truth over comfort: we speak our truth with compassion and hear others' truth with openness, even when it is hard, because growth happens at the edge of comfort. Restoration over punishment: our goal is never to punish but to heal the relationship and restore balance, addressing the root rather than assigning blame. And responsibility over blame: each of us looks first at our own part in a disagreement, because real resolution begins the moment we stop blaming others and own our own reactions and contributions.

From those principles comes a clear pathway. It begins, always, with inner work. Before any external move, you pause and turn inward: acknowledge the feeling without reacting, sit with it honestly, ask what the disagreement is really about and what your own role in it is, and try to arrive with a possible solution rather than only a complaint. Only then comes the dialogue, and it is a structured conversation, not a chaotic argument. It is held in its right time and place, in our morning or evening meetings or a private scheduled talk, never aired publicly or thrown down in the middle of the workday. One person speaks while the others listen without interruption, then the listeners reflect back what they heard, then the roles reverse. The aim is not to win but to understand, and if an hour brings no resolution, we agree to pause and reflect again rather than grind on.

If direct dialogue does not resolve it, the matter goes to mediation. For now, I serve as the neutral mediator, and let me be clear what that means: the mediator is not a judge who declares a winner. The mediator holds a safe space, guides both parties toward the real root, reflects back the deeper needs beneath the heat, and helps each person remember that they are bigger than the trigger of the moment. Only if a conflict is truly critical to the movement and cannot be healed through mediation does it rise to the weighted council for a final, binding decision.

Two special cases deserve naming. If the conflict involves me, the founder, then the whole core engineer team becomes the mediating body, holding the space and upholding these same principles, so that no one is beyond accountability. And if someone repeatedly chooses destructive conflict and refuses this restorative path, then, in the interest of the whole, a final decision about their place in the movement will be made, which may mean stepping away. Even then, our first stance is always toward understanding, forgiveness, and a chance to grow. And every real lesson a conflict teaches us is written down, anonymously if need be, and folded back into how we train the next generation, so that even our hardest moments become wisdom passed on.

WELCOME

The Door Is Open

This is the last page of the last book. Six books ago, this was only a set of questions I could not stop asking. Now it is a philosophy, a way of designing a life, a journey of becoming, a movement with a plan and a constitution, and, here, a door with your name near the handle.

You have read what we believe, how we live, how we build, how we govern, and what we ask of the ones who join. There is nothing hidden left to show you. All that remains is the choice, and the choice was always going to be yours alone.

So I will not sell you a final time. I will only say that the work is real, the need is urgent, and the few who feel it are rarer than they should be. If you are one of them, you do not need permission and you do not need a perfect moment. You need only to begin, where you are, with what you have, and to reach out.

The door is not a date, and it is not an announcement. The door is you, deciding to walk toward it. Come and build.
